Hofwyl and Hollybourne

A historic bridge of friendship

By Mason Stewart

Among the more frequent entries into the visitors log at Hofwyl Plantation during the early 1900's was the name, Charlotte M. Maurice. She was the wife of successful bridge builder, Charles Stewart Maurice, a member of the exclusive Jekyll Island Club and owner of Hollybourne, a 12,600 sq. ft. tabby "Cottage" on Jekyll.

Likewise, among the more frequent entries in the Jekyll Island Club registry of visitors to Hollybourne Cottage during the early 1900's was Miriam Cohen Dent, wife of estate farmer, James Troup Dent, the owner of Hofwyl Plantation, a 1,200-acre estate located on the banks of the Altamaha River near Darien.

At first glance, these two ladies seemed to have very little in common. Miriam was from a once prominent southern Jewish family in Savannah, while Charlotte hailed from a wealthy northern protestant family in Pennsylvania. However, their unlikely friendship forged a link between Hofwyl Plantation and Hollybourne Cottage that spanned two generations.

How did they meet and why did the two families become such strong and enduring friends? Well, exactly how they met is a bit of a mystery, but archival evidence suggests that it may have been because of their children.

Even though farm ledgers indicate that James and Miriam Dent were constantly struggling financially to hang on to the aging plantation, they nevertheless managed to squirrel away enough money to send their three children to exclusive private preparatory schools in the north. Their son Gratz attended the Taft School in Watertown, Connecticut and later graduated from Yale, while their daughters Miriam and Ophelia both attended the prestigious Rosemary Hall School for Girls in Greenwich, Conn., (later known as Choate.)

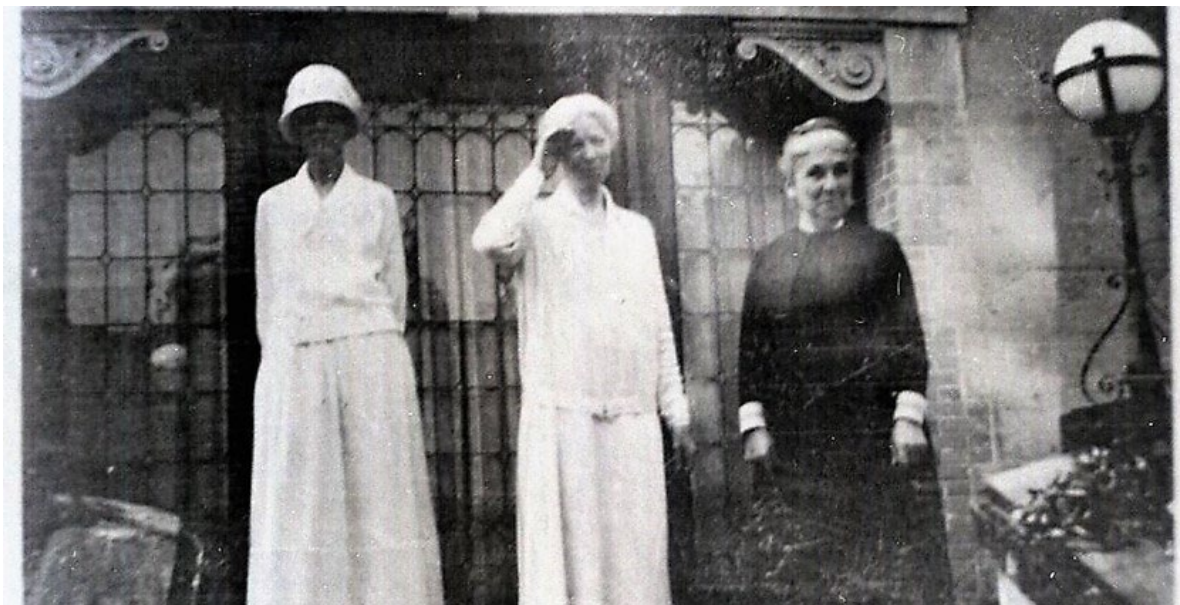

Coincidentally, one of Miriam Dent's classmates at Rosemary Hall was a young lady named Charlotte Maurice Touzalin, the daughter of a close friend and cousin of Charles Stewart Maurice. Along with being a cousin and friend of the Maurice family, records also indicate that Charlotte M. Touzalin was a tutor for the Maurice children on Jekyll. She also shows up in the guest registry at Hofwyl.

So, it is possible that the Maurices and Dents met while visiting the school. But, regardless of how it occurred, they and their children became lifelong friends.

Charlotte visited Hofwyl every year from 1900 until her untimely death from typhoid fever in 1909.

The Jekyll Island Club registry shows a similar pattern of visits to Hollybourne from Miriam. There is a photo on the mantle at Hollybourne showing Miriam Dent (the lady in black) on the front steps of the cottage.

The library at Hofwyl plantation is full of books dedicated to Miriam Dent from Charlotte Maurice given as presents at Christmas time. Even after both Miriam Dent and Charlotte Maurice had passed away, the Maurice children kept the tradition alive for many more Christmases with personally inscribed books dedicated to their friends, Gratz, Miriam, and Ophelia Dent.

If you visit Hofwyl and go upstairs to Miriam Dent's bedroom you will see a faded photograph on her night table. It is of Margarette (Peg) Maurice, a close friend and one of Charlotte Maurice's daughters.

Emily Maurice's wedding at Faith Chapel is the only recorded wedding on Jekyll during the Jekyll Island Club era. Miss Ophelia Dent of Hofwyl was one of Emily's brides maids. Following a huge wedding celebration party at Hollybourne cottage on Jekyll, the newlyweds spent several days of their honeymoon strolling among the stately moss draped oaks at their friend Ophelia's plantation home, Hofwyl.

Though the Dent and Maurice families are no longer there, the lasting memories of their friendship are now preserved forever in the historic sites of Hofwyl and Hollybourne.
